The European Carbon Tax: An Economic Assessment Jan 05 2021 CARLO CARRARO* AND DOMENICO SINISCALCO** * University of Udine, Greta and Fondazione Mattei; ** University of Turin and Fondazione Mattei 1. THE GLOBAL WARMING DEBATE The 1980s have seen an unprecedented growth in awareness of the problem of (man-induced) climate change. Scientific studies to assess the extent to which emissions resulting from human activities are increasing the atmospheric concentration of greenhouse gases (GHGs: carbon dioxide, methane, man-made chloro-fluorocarbons, nitrous oxide), thus contributing to raise the global mean temperature, have been carried out since the beginning of the decade. In 1990, a comprehensive report assessing the nature and the effects of global warming was presented by the Inter-Governmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), jointly established by the World Meteorological Organisation and the United Nations Environmental Programme. According to the Report, emissions resulting from human activities are substantially increasing the atmospheric concentration of GHGs. This is true, in particular, for carbon dioxide emissions, which result mainly from the burning of fossil fuels. The IPCC estimates that, in the last thirty years, the increase in the atmospheric concentration of CO2 has been substantially higher than in the last two centuries and the actual level is the highest among those registered in 160,000 years. The increasing atmospheric concentration of GHGs will enhance the greenhouse effect, resulting on average in an additional warming of the earth's surface. The main greenhouse gas, water vapour, will increase in response to global warming, and will further enhance it.
